

Manage the Clock

JOSH TURNER

I have been watching sports for a long time. My favorites are basketball, hockey, and football. I've noticed something interesting. When the game starts, players walk up to the line of scrimmage, jog from the sideline to the game, and it appears there is no need to hustle. At the end of the game when the game is tight and the score is close, something changes. We have what is referred to as clock management. You would be surprised at how well the athletes play and how the clock is managed. In fact, there is passion at the end of the game and a sense of urgency. But why do they wait until the last few seconds to begin clock management or to play with passion? It's because at the beginning of the game, they know they have time.

For many of us, the temptation is that we have plenty of time, and we end up wasting the first half on temporary things of this world. Why not live today as if it was our last and make eternal investments? Why not manage the clock better today?
